Not illustrated. 1843 Excerpt: .revealed the secret of his recovery thirteen years ago. On opening the chest, extensive adhesions were found between the upper half of the right lung and the pleura costalis. The lungs did not collapse on opening the chest, and presented a peculiar appearance. Externally, as well as throughout the whole substance of them, numerous small black gritty bodies were observed, about the size of currants; as well as others, three, four, and five times as large, formed of the same material, and which strongly resisted the edge of the scalpel. In the right lung an immense cavity was discovered, occupying nearly one-third of it. An idea of its capacity may be formed from the fact, that the gentleman, whose case it was, after laying it partly open, introduced his fist into it, and even then there was room for an additional body almost one-third the size, before the parietes of the cavity would be on a level with the rest of the lung. The sac was formed of a firm strong semicartilaginous membrane, into which no bronchial tubes opened. It contained a small portion of the debris of the lung. The ramifications of the bronchi were considerably dilated, the mucous membrane of the air-passages much thickened, but presented no appearance of ulceration or the traces of it. The bronchial glands, at the bifurcation of the trachea, were converted into a hard black gritty substance, about four times the size of a bean. Besides the black bodies...
