Not illustrated. 1847 Excerpt: . . . of the attendance of the inferior clergy in parliament: and it appears from the Annals of Burton--sub. ann. 1255--that the whole body of the clergy sat by representatives in the 39th of Henry III. History supplies other examples, and none of them are mentioned by the writers of the time as a novelty: a strong presumption, certainly, that the practice of representation was not altogether unknown long before the end of Henry the Thirds reign. If the representation of counties before the close of the third Henrys reign be involved in doubt, that of cities and boroughs may be considered more questionable, though supported by the authority of some eminent names. It is true that in the Saxon times the towns were often places of considerable strength and importance, and that London in particular had a great share in the politics of that troubled age. From Domesday book it appears that many boroughs included among their inhabitants persons of the rank of thanes, and owed military service to the king; and that the burgesses held their lands and tenements in heritage. The Conquest indeed materially affected their prosperity, but they gradually recovered it, and they acted a conspicuous part in the obtaining of Magna Charta, and the barons wars of Henry III. But whatever the growing importance of the boroughs, it is difficult to see on what ground, before they were incorporated, they could have claimed admission to the great council. As on the continent, before the gift of charters of...
