Excerpt: .implicit logic defying articulate analysis.<sup>1</sup> The contents of such knowledge share the common necessity of every kind of knowledge, of being subject to the test of wider experience. If it stands this test, it is as securely established as it can be. The knowledge which physical scientists possess of natural laws has this nature. As we have said already, the validity of knowledge does not depend ultimately upon the nature of the rational process, if normal, by which it is conditioned, but upon the trustworthiness of our cognitive faculties, a trustworthiness which we have to assume in practice; and it is confirmed by the harmony of what we are conscious of knowing with experience in general. There are only two legitimate ways of impugning the testimony of consciousness in this matter: (a) by showing that our minds have acted contrary to the observed laws of human knowledge, so as to fall into some logical fallacy; (b) by contrary evidence derived from experience, or the failure of what is thought to be known to fulfil the function of a working hypothesis.<sup>1</sup> 1 Moberly, Reason and Relig., p. 24, shows that the more instant the process of mental judgment the more perfect it is. Newman, as we saw in note 1 of p. 115, vindicates what he calls the illative sense at some length, Grammar of Assent, ch. viii., ix. The mind itself is more versatile than any of its works, . and it is only under...
