It is very desirable-that accurate measurements should be made of the i p. 3124. I children under instruction, so as to ascertain its effect in increasing muscular development. Records should be kept of the absences of children through illness, of their progress in other studies, and the results of these observations should be considered in connexion with the system of instruction adopted. In this way further guidance in directing the teaching on the best lines might be obtained. It must be remembered that manual training is yet, and is likely to remain for many years, a new subject. Its introduction into our schools marks an important change in our system of education. But it is still in its experimental stage. One of its chief advantages is to correct and mitigate the harmful results of that combination of circumstances, peculiar to the conditions under which the poorer classes have hitherto been educated, and known as over-pressure. In ordinary lessons, says M. Sluys, pupils remain at their desks many hours. This sitting position is bad; it enfeebles the body, and in this way reacts upon the mind. Gymnastic exercise has its raison d'être in the need of preserving the organic equilibrium. It increases the functional energy, and through this the moral. Manual exercises if they are properly chosen produce similar effects. That manual training may be made the means of developing the muscular strength, and of preserving and improving the health...
